London Bridge  (set in 1415)

In front of her the river shimmered in the sunlight of a bright spring morning. It looked like a big lake shut in on three sides by banks of houses. On the north side the buildings all around her crowded down to the water’s edge, ending in a broken line of wharfs and warehouses and a jumble of roofs. Opposite, on the south bank, there were gardens amongst the houses and a background of trees to mark the open country.

Between the north bank and the south, like a great wall across the river, lay London Bridge which had a street of houses and shops all the way along it, and, into the bargain, a gatehouse and a drawbridge and even a chapel with pinnacles and turrets, all built upon its massive arches and buttresses.

The tide was at the flood and the water lay high against the Bridge, so calm that a second Bankside and a second Bridge were reflected upside down upon its surface. But soon the tide would turn and then the river would rush back seawards through the narrow arches, roaring and groaning like an imprisoned beast sucking into rapids and whirlpools anything that came in its way.

Nan knew the sound of it well, for their old nurse, Goody Doubleday, lived on the Bridge and sometimes, for a great treat, she was allowed to stay the night with Goody. She loved to lie cosily in bed listening to the noises that the water made as it gushed underneath the house.

But at this moment everything seemed very quiet. The little ships tied up by the wharfs all lay in idleness, their brightly coloured sails furled. No work was being done, no cargoes loaded or unloaded for it was Ascension Day, a holy day, and the few people to be seen were either fishing from the quays or lounging about and gossiping. Even the clatter of the streets was stilled. She could hear quite clearly the little noises which as a rule were lost in the grinding of heavy wheels on cobbledstones: there was a solitary horseman clip-clopping along Thames Street and the doves were cooing in Master Whittington’s garden half way up the hill.

Suddenly, from far off a new sound pierced the stillness, the clear shrill note of a trumpet. …

Section B

Choose one of the following options

EITHER
A) Continue the story from the point where it leaves off using as your first sentence the last one of the passage:
   “Suddenly, from far off a new sound pierced the stillness, the clear shrill note of a trumpet. ...”

OR

B) Nan is looking at a scene which is unusually still because it is a holy-day or holiday. Imagine you are Nan looking at the same scene on a busy working day and describe that view of London Bridge and its surroundings. Remember you are in 1415 so there are no cars!

OR

C) In the passage, we were looking back at Nan’s world of 1415 where life is different to the 21st Century.
   Write a story in which you go to stay with a friend or a relation who lives in a very different context or environment from your own or has a very different lifestyle. Imagine how disconcerting or strange you might find the experience and try to bring this into the story. (For example: your relation might have no electronic devices / might live on a remote island with no electricity / might be a hill farmer / might be an aid worker helping refugees ... use your imagination!)
